The study estimates the expected rate of increase in the fertility rate, population size and the number of births per year. The data does not explain why the rate decreased. These questions are asked because although the study authors' results are a reasonable estimate it is important to understand why they changed their conclusions, especially where this change affects the estimated effect of the immigration policy. One factor is the revised estimates of changes in immigration that have been incorporated by some researchers to the population estimates included in this report. This is of critical importance because these revised estimates make it possible to identify changes in the overall population (or population estimates at small geographic units) when necessary. The second factor related to the statistical question posed by the

To illustrate some of the issues this report addresses we illustrate some of the possible results. First of all, it is important to look at the study results for the total fertility rate to get a general idea of what can be expected. As can be seen from the table below, the authors of the report conclude that the general rate of the population will increase. However, only the estimate with the lowest range of values is considered valid. With the new figures available they have revised their original estimate (see Figure 12) and instead focus on the middle-quartile range and conclude with the expected rate increasing at an average rate of approximately 4-5 percent per year, with the expected increase with increasing numbers of births or with increasing fertility. This figure comes from an assessment in the second half of 2009 that included the following questions (see the supplemental information at the end of this report). What percentage of the population will be below the middle-quartile (the 95th percentile) of fertility?.. Given a new population size and a standard formula for calculating the population size, how many people (per man) will have the same sex preference as the previous population?.. http://www.nytimes.com/
